Editor Counts Voting Revision As 'High Point of Semester'

After forty-five, hectic, deadline nights, I have finally reached the end of the road as editor of the Spectator in the full knowledge that I'm not the only one breathing a sigh of relief.

The ebb and flow of a semester as editor-in-chief has both its rewards and disappointments. It has also fostered an appreciation for those who have diligently worked to make this semester's Spectator possible.

For me, the high point of the semester was the adoption of the electoral amendment and the subsequent election of students with the drive, vitality and ideas necessary to make the Student Council more than a "cardboard" organization.

I do not regret using all the resources at my command to elevate the role of student government and encouraging it to be the effective instrument it needs to be:

I hope the interest in student government at Macollege continues to increase and intensify—that students will regard it not as an annual spring activity, but as president-elect Mohler put it, "to remember that student government goes on all year, not just during election week."

My major disappointment has been my inability to substantially reduce the lethargic attitude of McPherson College students as a whole. It is a pathetic situation when the International Relations Club, the Young Republicans and the Young Democrats have a combined active membership of only two dozen students.

Not only are students indifferent toward national and international events, but this attitude manifests itself with regard to campus affairs. However, I am convinced that this apathy will continue to prevail where students are made to feel like rebels or traitors if they criticize certain campus policies and suggest changes. And, to some extent, this is one of the problems of McPherson College.

The sign of a really healthy "family" is individuality and constructive disagreement rather than anemic, mute acceptance of everything handed down from the top.

But this position, with all its rewards and disappointments, has been a wonderful opportunity for me. I would like to emphasize that I have never been censored and have had complete freedom in the editing of this paper.

I would certainly be remiss if I did not express my appreciation to Mrs. Brunk for her encouragement and ideas, and to the reporters and business managers without whose help the Spectator could never have been published.

Bev has been invaluable as an excellent and dependable managing editor, and Dave has always been reliable and willing to work in his position as campus editor.

It was a great staff to work with, and I know that as the 62-63 academic year draws to a close they would join me in wishing you good luck on your exams—have an enjoyable summer! WMB the rule has not been enforced. The council is not to blame; they have provided a means of enforcement.

Council Votes To Raise Wages For Publications

By Roger Emmert
Student Council voted May 15 to accept the proposed salary changes for publications personnel brought from the Board of Publications.

This change will mean that next year $950 will be paid in salaries to publications personnel instead of the present $330. Possible bonuses were also increased from $250 to $450.

Increases were made mainly in the salaries of the managing editor and business manager of the Spectator.

The council voted to take the added expense for the salary increase from the Publications Reserve Fund.

This was accepted on a one-year basis with provisions being made for an experienced group to study salary needs and make a definite proposal next year which would be permanent.

The council also authorized the payment of money from the Publications Reserve Fund for supplies needed for the Quadrangle office.

LITTLE MAN ON CAMPUS

Author Clarifies Philosophy Voiced in 'Men of Values'

By Peter Ford

Art should not be discussed according to the philosophy it presents. However, "Men of Values," one of the plays at the recent Fine Arts Festival has apparently caused some misunderstanding of the view of human life which it expressed.

Therefore, perhaps a short explanation is in order.

As indicated by the title, all of the sailors in the play had values according to the level of society from which they came.

The "lowly swabbies" were not meant to represent men in general. There were two idealists: Edward Martin, the young seaman, and Jonathon, the old tar.

Hope was shown when the young idealist succeeded in influencing the sailors and swinging them to his ideas. His death was one of those unfortunate accidents of life.

While the author of the play is skeptical of much of the "natural goodness" in man, he still believes that there is a spark within mankind which will enable further evolution of the human animal.

As a Unitarian Universalist, the author of the play is an inveterate optimist. As a member of a humanistic faith, it would be impossible for him to show man as a depraved creature; it is against his religion.

The general philosophy of the play is that life is harsh and cruel, but it is also pathetically beautiful.

Perhaps this explanation will clarify any misconceptions as to the intent of "Men of Values."

We Get Letters . . .

Reader Accuses Student Council Of Inconsistency

To the Editor:

It seems strange that the Student Council can never be consistent. For example, let us look at the Bermuda shorts "problem."

A little while ago, the Council defined its stand on Bermuda shorts: No Bermuda shorts were to be worn in the Student Union at mealtime.

Apparently the Council forgot the ruling and failed to enforce it.

Now the Council wishes to remove the shorts ban during exam week. Why couldn't it have let the matter drop?

The Council has put itself in a very ambiguous position in wishing to remove the shorts ban, but going on in the meeting and retaining it.

(And most likely the new rule will not be enforced either.)

Sincerely,
James E. Weaver

Criticism Invalid, Meaningless, Replies Student

Dear Editor,

Recognizing that this is the last Spectator of the year, I have taken advantage of my position on the staff to read Jim Weaver's letter in advance. I would now like to reply to that letter.

First of all, Jim's accusation that the Student Council is never consistent is not only invalid, it is also meaningless. Does he expect the council to be absolutely unanimous in all its decisions?

Cannot one member of the council question and seek to change a previous decision without the whole council being accused of being inconsistent? This is actually what happened; one member of the council proposed that the rule be suspended. The council was never more consistent than when it voted this proposal down!

Perhaps Jim wants a council in which there are never any such "inconsistent" proposals. A council in which there is never any conflict of ideas, debate, or compromise. There do exist such monolithic governments, but in most places, they are even more unpopular than our Student Council.

Personally, I prefer a council with conflicting points of view, representing the conflicting views of its constituency. And, to such a council, the accusation of being inconsistent is meaningless, because there will always be those seeking to change existing decisions.

If and when such persons gain a majority votes, the decisions will be changed. It is the democratic way, be it consistent or inconsistent.

The second thing I would like to deal with is Jim's statement, "Apparently the council forgot the ruling and failed to enforce it." Once again this is an invalid criticism.

It is every bit as much Jim's responsibility to enforce this rule as it is the council's responsibility. The council has provided a means by which this rule can be enforced. Namely, through the Student Court acting upon a complaint signed by a student or campus organization.

So, you see, it is the fault of the students like Jim and me that

China's Rapid Progress Means Hope for Future -- Not Despair

By Peter Tham

Many believe that China's economy is in chaos; the great leap forward has failed, the educational system is stagnated by doctrinaires, and the people underfed.

These are, however, drawn from people who had a short visit or stay in China and had no adequate understanding of China.

In my understanding, I can confidently say that the new China is far better than the old.

According to the eyewitness, David Crook, professor of English at the Institute of Foreign Languages in Peking, "China should be viewed in perspective."

After spending 25 years in China, he said that "in the first half of this century, millions of Chinese died of hunger, famine, and epidemics. Tenants and laborers—about two-thirds of the people—had no hope of redress against greedy landlords or corrupt officials. Over 80 per cent of the people were illiterate. Most women live in degraded subjection. This has been swept away."

It is almost ridiculous to say that the great leap forward has failed. "By the end of 1962, there was a four-fold increase in the number of tractors, a more than ten-fold increase in drainage and irrigation equipment as compared with 1957." This result was indeed a great leap forward.

Having been in dormancy under Confucianism for the past centuries, the change to a new social and economic basic unit for some 650 million people could not be effected without some miscalculation.

"But these do not condemn the institution. It took time to work out methods of management suited to a people emerging from illiteracy."

In regard to education, one cannot deny that the educational system of any country is bound to reflect the dominant socio-political values of the society of which it is a part.

In the United States, education has been expected to be concerned with economic well-being, equality of social opportunity, development of the intellectual, and the promotion of culture. Likewise, China has to accept Marxism-Leninism as the essential faith of the society.

The Chinese do not deny the values of poetry and arts. On the contrary, they encourage both traditional and contemporary art forms. But the immediate job of education is to remake an old society into a new nation, based on scientific knowledge and the skill of technology.

I must say that it is our interest to look at China without prejudice. The picture behind the bamboo curtain is not one of despair. Rather, it is the atmosphere of vigor, dedication and optimism.

Spec Needs Reporters

Several reporters are needed to work on the Spectator for the coming school year. Those interested in applying for these positions may contact Mrs. Brunk, preferably before the end of the school year.

Reporters may take reporting practice in the fall and spring semesters, for which they will receive one hour of credit for each semester.

Student Teachers to Work In New Mac High School

Macollege secondary teaching students who take the practice teaching first semester next year will have the opportunity to work in McPherson's new High School.

The building built with flexibility and expansion in mind has as its heart the library. Every other section of the building has easy access to the library.

The various sections of the building are hexagonal in shape. There are two hexagons on the east side, two on the west side, and three in the center section. Each hexagon averages 6,000 square feet.

The gymnasium, which will be used by all groups in McPherson, is built in a circle. The circle is 150 feet in diameter. Folding bleachers are to be placed on the circumference of the gym floor. Some of the new features of the new high school are centrality of the library, departmentalized sections with teacher office space and teaching aids storage, and open-style hall ways.

The building is set up to handle expansion, new methods of teaching, and team teaching. It is also set up for television instruction, which will add to the school's curriculum.

Candidates to Observe Classes in Public School

All prospective student teachers of next semester must participate in a September observing experience.

Each candidate must observe one whole week, before college begins, in a classroom to see how the teacher gets acquainted with her new pupils.
