Article not intended to slight Stine's support

In response to an article in the Dec. 10 issue of the Spectator entitled "Research fund ceases after 13 years," Bob Knechel, executive director of advancement, sent an e-mail to the McPherson College community expressing his disappointment and embarrassment that the issue was treated in a negative manner.

"It would have been helpful to all who read the Spectator to know that while Mr. Stine may have chosen to eliminate his annual gifts to the senior science research program, which he generously supported for 13 years, he is currently matching all gifts to the Enhancing the Legacy campaign up to $10 million," Knechel wrote.

The intent of the Spectator article was to inform readers of the advancements the science research program can attribute to Mr. Stine's generosity, as well as the science department's wish for continued funding. Thus, the focus was on the science department, not Mr. Stine. Unfortunately, the tone of the article has given a negative impression to some readers.

Since the publication of the article, faculty and administration together have been exploring the possibility of a campus-wide senior research fund. Due to the generosity of Mr. Stine and many other benefactors to the college, this possibility is quite realistic.

The Spectator and its writers always strive to present information in an honest and unbiased manner. We apologize for any misunderstanding that may have taken place and are eager to keep the McPherson College community informed of any developments on the topic of senior research.

What do you think of the new yearbook format?

"I think it's nice because people who come only for a semester or who transfer out get one. I also think they didn't have as much coverage as a year-end book."

Women can be found on campus

On Her Orange Crate

SARAH STOVER

Men. If you read nothing else in this paper, read this column. It could change your life, or at least make your Valentine's Day less lonely.

Everyone is aware of the skewed guy-to-girl ratio on this campus. Last year it was almost even, but this year women form a definite minority.

Here are some suggestions for the men who are looking for high density estrogen areas.

- Run for student government.
- Make friends with the Dotzour men.
- Apply to be a resident assistant. Who else has permission to be in the women's halls after hours?
- Go to chapel.
- Use the computer labs in the co-ed dorms.
- Lobby-dwell in the co-ed dorms.
- Move to the co-ed dorms.
- Go to the chick-flicks Tuesday nights and cry.
- TURN OFF THE TV.

■ Join choir. Not only will you be in the minority, but after you polish your crooning abilities, you will have the courage to serenade the woman of your dreams. As long as her screen is still in her window, the worst you can get is a splash of cold water.

■ Write for the Spectator, or work on the yearbook.

■ Get a job as an office assistant in the Mohler offices.

■ Camp-out by the mailboxes. Everyone gets mail (occasionally).

■ Spend time in Dotzour lobbies. Third floor has the biggest TV, but has half the female population of the other floors. A toss-up, I know.

■ Change your major to elementary education.

■ Get a job working in the cafeteria. Everyone has to eat.

■ Find yourself some friends, dye your hair, paint yourself red and become the women's basketball team's biggest fans. I'm serious.

I might also suggest that you run down your current list of "ways to meet women on campus," and delete the following:

■ Call in the middle of the night or leave voice mails that say, "I'm drunk. Call me."

■ Sneak into belly dance demonstrations "for women only" with your camera.

■ Hang out by the women's restroom, making small talk as women leave.

■ Leave messages on dry-erase boards that say, "I'm lonely, and need comforting. Call #####."

Simplicity the theme of Puerto Rican trip

Cornerstone

TANG YANG

A lot of people have asked me how the trip to Puerto Rico was. My answer is that it was great! We had a lot of fun and we all learned a lot. We saw things we didn't expect to see. We also learned things we may never use again, like building houses. We each became experts at something—building decks, nailing and painting roofs, building walls.

Eight women signed up for the service learning project class over interterm. We could have used some guys! We spent the month in Culebra, near Puerto Rico.

Culebra is a beautiful island with nice but unpredictable weather. One minute it was raining and the next minute the sun was burning our skin. Sometimes when it was too windy, there were blackouts. The whole island would be pitch black. The islanders told us, "You Americanos worry about the Y2K? We have Y2K everyday!"

We worked six days a week. Breakfast was at 7 a.m., which meant we had to get up by 6:30 a.m. We got off work at 3:30 and we could go to the beach, do laundry, or whatever. It was heavy work. None of us had any experience building houses, so the work was new to us.

Because of the shortage of water, we couldn't flush the toilet every time we used the restroom. "If it's yellow, let it mellow; if it's brown, flush it down!" the saying went.

We couldn't let the shower run the whole time we were showering either. We wet ourselves, turned off the shower, put on soap and shampoo, washed, then turned the shower on to rinse. Gosh! How we missed flushing the toilet and taking long and nice showers! We also experienced some long walks, mostly uphill.

We worked on six different houses. We completely finished two. We weren't able to finish the other four because we didn't have enough supplies or time.

Every morning we had devotions, then we were divided into work groups. One group would work on the roof while another worked on the deck, or the walls, or on putting up hurricane straps. Some days, we didn't have much to do because of the lack of supplies. Other days we had a lot to do, which made us feel very productive.

While I was there I saw things that changed my whole perspective on life.

A lot of them are good things, but some of them are bad.

I saw families of four with a refrigerator the size of the one I have in my dorm room. I saw whole families living in one-room houses. There were no bathrooms or kitchens. Calling the room a living room doesn't even come close! Also, they had no decent jobs! The truth is, there are hardly jobs for anyone.

The one good thing, and the most important thing I learned from this trip is the way the people there handle their lives. No matter how rough life is for them, they are happy. They don't complain, whine, or get angry about it. They live their lives in the simplest way.

What I saw makes me realize how fortunate I am. I'm so glad I had the opportunity to do something good for ones less fortunate. I felt privileged to share my time, energy, and strength with them. I learned that the focus of living is not merely what we have, but it's who we have.

To those of you who have done this kind of work before, may you always be blessed with more than you give. And to those of you who haven't, reach out and grab the hands that need you.

I would like to thank God for His love and mercy, for reaching out His right hand to guide us there and back, especially on the planes, because the weather was bad. I also thank Him for keeping us safe when we were working down there.

Many thanks go to the Church of the Brethren, Project Impact, McPherson College, Ocie Kilgus and her whole family, Cliff and Arlene (a couple who went with us), and everyone else who made this trip happen! It was wonderful. May you all be richly and fruitfully blessed by the Lord our God for what you have done.

CAMPUS FORUM

Fill "our house" with school spirit

Fellow McPherson College administration, faculty, staff, and students: I want to say how appreciative I am to be a student again, and how wonderful it feels to be in class and to read textbooks again. I went to one of the basketball games recently, and I felt like a teenager again. The crowd was cheering loudly and really supporting their teams.

The problem was it was the other team. We were playing in our gym, our house, but after the game, the players and fans from the other team crammed the floor and shouted, "Whose house?" "Our house!"

I can't remember the last time I felt so low. I have always prided myself in supporting our athletic teams and drama productions, but it seems times have changed. We don't have that support. We don't have the spirit. We don't seem to care anymore.

It is not just the students, although they should be the ones that fill the gym. It isn't their friends and peers out there playing, but faculty, staff and administration are also lacking school spirit. At a time when strategic planning holds meeting after meeting to discuss how to increase retention and enrollment, it seems we are forgetting the most important thing.

We want more students, and we want them to stay, but we don't show any support or care when they need it. How can we expect them to want to stay if we don't act like we want them too?

Now I am just as guilty as the next guy, and have no right to stand on a soapbox. I just wanted to share my thoughts.

Another incident touched me. While at another game, I noticed our pep-band playing their hearts out. I was proud, very proud. I just wish they could have showed up to support the girls in the previous game. In a society that is pushing equality of sexes and equal airtime for men and women sports, I think it is time to do the same at Mac.

I have missed a lot of games and other activities because they didn't interest me, but I was wrong. You are too. We are all wrong if we don't support our fellow students and friends. There comes a time when you realize they are what make college special. As an employee of McPherson College, they are what keep me working.

All employees of McPherson College need to realize that we work for the students. They are our customers and first concern.

No gratitude expressed for research funding

I want to express my chagrin, embarrassment, and disappointment with the Dec. 10, 1999, Spectator article entitled "Research fund ceases after 13 years." Perhaps I'm being a bit too sensitive, but I found no sense of gratitude expressed for those 13 years of support from Mr. Stine. Rather, I read criticism, shock, confusion, bewilderment over a donor's change of direction in his giving.

It would have been helpful to all who read the Spectator to know that while Mr. Stine may have chosen to eliminate his annual gifts to the senior science research program, which he generously supported for 13 years, he is currently matching all gifts to the Enhancing the Legacy campaign up to $10 million. That is the single largest gift given to any college or university in Kansas' history!

When the campaign is successfully concluded, at least $8 million of the matching money is designated for the college's endowment fund (at Mr. Stine's request). In addition, it should be noted for all who may have received a negative impression of Mr. Stine through the quotations and general tone of the Spectator article, that it is only through Mr. Stine's current generosity that we have built two new residence halls, a plant operations building, Mingenback Theatre, Hess Fine Arts Center, and will soon begin the Melhorn Science Hall all debt free, no construction loans.

In brief, McPherson College is in the debt of Mr. Harry Stine's generosity—and in the debt of thousands of others who give generously and as they are able. It is important for all of us to remember that our very existence as an academic community has been and will continue to be dependent on other's generosity.

We will be better served if we seek ways to express our gratitude for all they have done and continue to do for McPherson College.

English life different, "snogging" the same

International Perspective

JEN TAYLOR

"I'm not drinking. The orange juice is fine," I said, scanning the room for a sign so I could make my move for the toilet.

"So, what do people in America do when they fancy someone?"

I begin to think of every 1950's euphemism for dating. I'm trying to be nice and experience a cultural exchange with the slimeball, afterall.

"Not much, we just sort of hang out, really do nothing." This should fend him off for two minutes.

"Do they," he says with a Rico Suave head bob, "kiss?" He leans in. I jolt back.

"NO! Nope, not at all, we don't ever really." Frantically, I turn to my friend, a fellow American who could possibly back me up. Of course at that very time, she was snogging someone. There went that theory.

Students at university in England are rather different than Americans. For example, most pubs and clubs have student nights, so that every night of the week a student can go dancing for about $2. This means that every night people are going out and hanging out with his or her friends.

Whereas Americans go and relax and enjoy ourselves on the weekend, that's when English students start in on their homework. This is OK, since most classes meet once a week, which usually means more homework, or in my case, studying performance art, which means more free time. I won't even get into my performance art class stories. Let's just use that old, over-used saying: "Toto I don't think we're in Kansas anymore".

Out of the classroom and into the real world

Students recall lessons learned during interterm trips

Interterm in Chicago

Laura Morgan

Spectator Staff

Many of you have probably seen the signs around campus that talk about the Urban Life Center, and you've probably wondered what they are all about. I think instead of wondering about the posters, you should look into them. Chicago was a great place to go when feeling overwhelmed by college.

The Urban Life Center was an absolutely fantastic learning experience. I learned that even though sometimes you feel lost in what you want to be, that if you have the desire to achieve, you will make it.

I lived in an apartment with four other girls. I learned how to use public transportation. I began to see the enjoyment of many "different" people. I saw theater events, went to jazz clubs, art centers, and did some required eating at many different ethnic restaurants.

The event in Chicago that really touched my heart was my internship. For ULC, I had to pick a place where I wanted to do an internship. I knew right away what I wanted to do. I wanted to be able to work with kids who were HIV positive or had cancer.

Things seemed to be coming together with that choice until December, when the children's hospital where I had wanted to work said it only wanted someone who would be there long-term.

Valerie, my advisor for ULC, found me another internship, at AIDSCARE, a shelter for people who are HIV positive and dying of AIDS. She was not sure what I would actually do, and I was a bit reluctant when I said yes. I ended up being really glad that I agreed to intern at AIDSCARE. My first day there, I was nervous about what kind of environment it would be like. I thought it would be a lot like a nursing home. My predictions were mostly wrong.

AIDSCARE was no shelter or nursing home. It was a HOME—the only home some of the people who lived there had ever known. I was a volunteer in the kitchen, where I helped prepare and fix meals. I also was taught the importance of serving different food for the residents. It was important, mainly because of the medication that they have to take. Some people had to take anything from 10 to 46 tablets a day just to feel "well." In between meals, I would sit and talk to the residents. It is always amazing to hear the stories that lie behind a person.

My last day, I walked away with a sense of accomplishment. I knew AIDSCARE was a facility I would like to work in when I become a doctor. In the short time I was there I had touched people and that made me happy.

There is one man that I will never forget. In the seven days I was there, he talked to me, trusted me, and opened up to me, something he had not done with anyone for a long time. It made me feel honored and focused. The whole experience in Chicago focused me to get back to school and be what I've always wanted to be—a doctor.

Interterm in Puerto Rico

Laina McKellip

I went to Puerto Rico this January for the Service Learning class. It was an unforgettable experience, one that changed my life.

Eight women from McPherson College shared this experience. Each added something to the group.

We were on the small island of Culabra, 22 miles off the mainland of Puerto Rico. Before arrival, I expected to be in the middle of nowhere with access to nothing. I was completely wrong.

We were placed on the main street in a little house above the post office. Don't get me wrong. This town wasn't a thriving metropolis, but it was definitely civilization. While in Culabra, we worked on six different houses. One reason we were there was to stabilize houses for hurricanes, but we did a lot more than just that. Some houses we added on to and then others we just made more livable.

A woman named Isabel owned one of the houses that we worked on, one that will be embedded into my memory. I don't think that I had ever seen anyone living in such poverty.

All of the beds were crammed into one corner of the house, and the kitchen was outside. The bathroom was placed a few yards away. When it rained outside, it rained inside. The house provided no shelter.

And Isabel saved everything. But everything she saved had some important meaning to her. I can't even recall how many times she showed me a picture of her dream house and told me that her husband was going to build it for her. It is hard to think that she will probably never get it.

Her husband was a recovering alcoholic. Three small children lived in the house with them, but Isabel and her husband had more kids. Her children were all eager to help. They wanted to be close to us.

One of the kids called me his "little horse," because he liked to climb on my back and kick me in the side to make me go. Playing with the children was probably one of my favorite events while I was there. They didn't care if we could speak their language or not. They talked our ear off anyway.

I also experienced the joy of simplicity while in Puerto Rico. We didn't have a vehicle, so if we wanted to go somewhere, we had to walk. The plumbing wasn't that great, either. When we showered, we had to turn off the water while we lathered up. Also, there was no hot water.

Material things became unimportant, though. We didn't wear nice things, because they would be ruined. There was no primping, because there was nothing to primp with. I have decided that living simply can be very rewarding. It taught me to look at who I really am, instead of at my exterior.

I met a lot of people on this trip and experienced their lifestyles. I tried my hardest to help them out and in the end, it helped me. The projects were physically and mentally challenging. Our group was called Project Impact, but in a lot of ways, I have been impacted the most.

Interterm in New York and Washington, D.C.

Chris Curran

Spectator Staff

I was one of 23 students and faculty who traveled to New York City and Washington, D.C. during interterm for the biannual Investments trip. The group spent seven days in New York City and five days in Washington, D.C. Throughout the trip we visited various sites and attractions in both cities, as well as scheduled appointments having to do with the class.

New York City can be summed up in two words: move fast! Wait is a four-letter word in NYC, and you don't stand around unless you want to get run over. Now imagine 22 college students following Lowell Flory into the subway, along crowded streets, and into restaurants, every single one of us looking around like our heads were on a swivel, amusing the general population of NYC. That is how we were the first few days.

By the end of the trip we began to travel in smaller groups. (It is faster, trust me.) We walked faster and negotiated crowded subways like NASCAR drivers, and stopped taking pictures of every tall building that we saw.

While in NYC the group in one form or another saw "Les Miserables." It was my first musical, my first Broadway production. I saw the movie version with Liam Neeson before we left for New York. Otherwise, I wouldn't have been able to understand the plot. But the whole experience was magical, as the stage was transformed from a busy city street to a church to a bridge over a river to a barricade in a revolution.

The Empire State Building was amazing and comical. I think the biggest attraction for people was to call people that they knew and say, "Hey, I'm on the top of the Empire State Building." I didn't have any change, so I went outside to the observation deck and yelled, "Hey, I'm the King of the World!" The security guards laughed the entire elevator ride down before they threw me out on the street.

That reminds me: Does anyone know how many taxicabs there are in NYC? The exact number is a little bit over 5,000, but I think they are a little off in their count. You can't walk five steps without a cab almost running you over.

My advice about visiting NYC is this:

Stay in a cheap hotel. Don't stay at the Ritz or the Plaza. On a cold day you would be tempted to stay in your room, order room service, have a massage. But if you stay in a cheap hotel, your room will be the same temperature as the outdoors, so you might as well get out and see NYC.

Piece of advice No. 2: Buy luggage with wheels on the bottom. The train ride to D.C. from NYC was an adventure in itself. Imagine those same 22 college students with three pieces of luggage each. Now imagine all that luggage stacked and piled together in the middle of Penn Station with about four people guarding while the rest of the group tries to get some last minute shopping done.

After NYC, one describes D.C.: clean. The subways were cleaner, the streets were cleaner, and the hotel was cleaner...sort of. If NYC was a person and could speak, it would say something like this: "This is who I am, so deal with it." D.C. would say something like this: "I'm built with the money from taxpayers, so I have to look my best."

D.C. was a nice, calm way to finish the trip after NYC. The second Tuesday of the trip we woke up to the biggest snowstorm to hit the East Coast since 1996. That day we got to see our tax dollars not at work, as the entire city shut down. By that time everyone was tired and dreaming of balmy Kansas (I forgot to mention that it was 13 degrees in NYC, not counting wind chill, which put it about at minus-4 or minus-5).

The cold weather kept the locals at home, so only brave tourists were out looking at the monuments. People in the group were able to get some really good pictures of all of the memorials. My best memory of D.C. will be the time I spent at the Vietnam Memorial Wall looking at my uncle's name.

By the time we got on the plane to return to Kansas we were all seasoned travelers, half of us falling asleep before take off. We arrived in McPherson to see fresh snow, and the temperature in the high twenties—hot for us.

All in all the trip was a total success. We learned to huddle together to preserve body heat, we began to understand why tourists are some of the most feared people in the world, and some of us had our first experience with an iron. I would recommend this trip to anyone.

Lady Bulldogs achieve first win

Elizabeth Stover
Sports Editor

With their first win under their belts, the Lady Bulldogs are looking to keep the momentum in tomorrow night's contest against the Ottawa Hawkeyes. Ottawa is one of the top four teams in the conference. In their last meeting, the Hawkeyes came out on top, 91-61.

The women endured a 69-109 loss to Bethany on Monday.

"It was just one of those nights. Bethany is good. We couldn't get anything going," said head coach Mel Wright. "But we have the potential to win. Ottawa will be tough to rebound, but we have more speed."

The team has grown in numbers this semester with Minnie Gutierrez, a soph. transfer from the University of Texas. She has proved to be an asset to the team, scoring 10 points and grabbing two rebounds off the bench against Tabor.

"She is very dedicated and hard working young lady," teammate Jaime Howell said of Gutierrez.

The starting five for the Bulldogs have been consistent. Julie Scheef, Jessica Brown, Amber Allen, Keyda Strozier, and Howell "are playing together really well," according to Wright.

Their hard work paid off the evening of Jan. 27 when they met the Tabor Bluejays. Despite jumping to an early 20-8 lead, the women struggled and went into half-time with only a one-point lead. But the Bulldogs held on for a convincing 82-65 victory.

"The game see-sawed back and forth all night long," Wright said.

Howell was the high scorer with 21 points. She also had 11 rebounds.

"We played well as a team. We could have played better but I'm just glad we came out on top," Howell said.

Also helping out were Strozier (15 points, 7 rebounds), Brown (9 points, 4 rebounds), and Scheef (5 points, 3 assists). The bench showed good depth with Gutierrez, Jess Rainey, and Kyronna Sumral contributing.

"We've improved consistently through the season. It also helps that we're all healthy, with no injuries or players out with the flu. I feel confident about finishing the season strong," Coach Wright said.

The Bulldogs take on Ottawa at home this Sat., Feb. 12, and Kansas Wesleyan away on Feb. 17. Because of Tabor's similar win/loss record, the women still have a chance at a berth to the playoffs.

"I think if we play hard together as a team we [can win]," Strozier said.

Intramural 3-on-3 ends

The team of Jonas Lichty, Billy Smith, Landon Porter, Chuck Kalin and Antonio Rael came out with first place honors in the three-on-three basketball tournament that ended Feb. 2. Eight teams, each consisting of three to five players, participated in this year's tournament.

Coming in second was John Elliot, Brian Piefer, Jeff Scott and Russell Matchel. Billy Smith and Emanuel Roland were named Most Valuable Players of the tournament.

Organizers Jenny Williams, Todd Hague, and Doug Hague have spearheaded all of this year's intramural events, including flag football and volleyball last fall.

"It's fun to get together with other people for a fun and competitive game."

— Nikki Unruh-Carey

"Everyone showed up and played hard, which made it [run] pretty smoothly," said Todd Hague.

The teams played every Wednesday and Sunday night starting at seven o'clock and played a game each half-hour. The games were played to 15 points or until a win by two occurred. No one involved in intercollegiate basketball was eligible to play in the tournament.

"Now that I'm done with organized sports, it's fun to get together with other people for a fun and competitive game," said Nikki Unruh-Carey, sr.

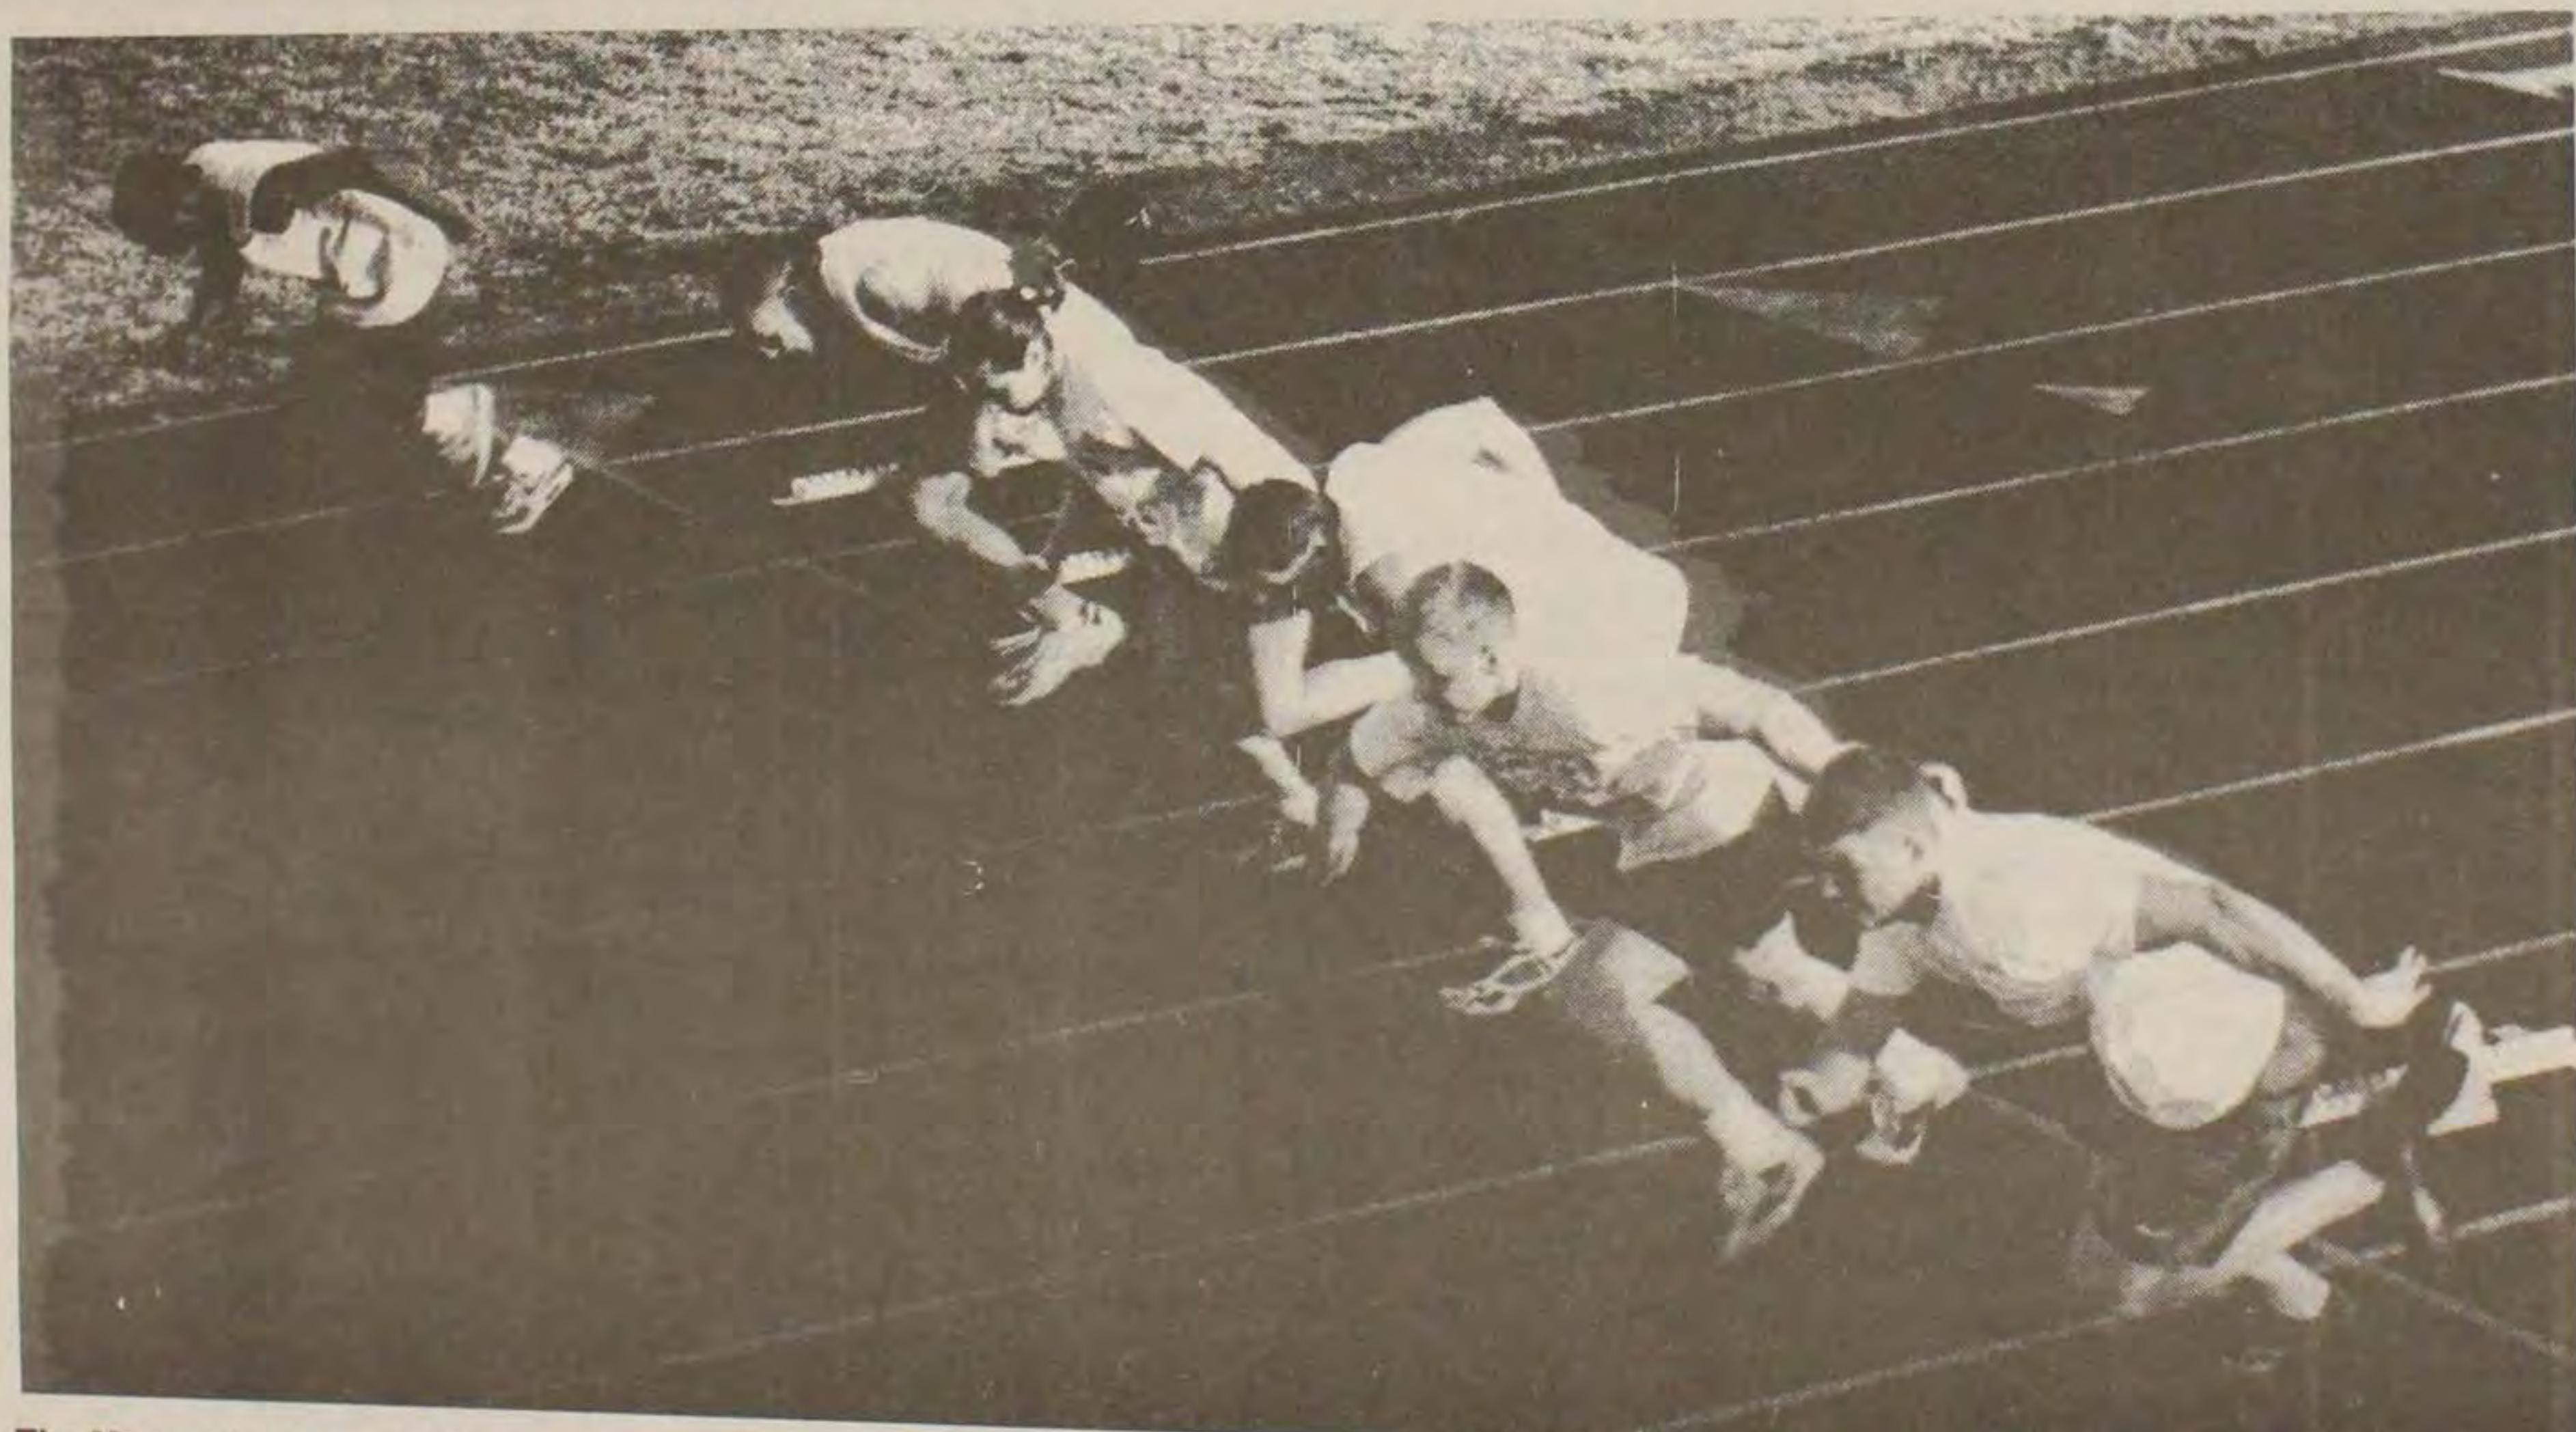

"The rule about the 15 points was good because it let you play, seeing how each basket was worth only one point," said Russell Matchel, fr. "Then if you were tied at 15 you would play till 17. To me this is nothing new. I have played with these rules before with other sports. This allows teams to play with intensity but still play to work out."

"Jen, Todd and Doug organized well-run intramural games. Not only did they do a good job on the three-on-three tournament, but they also did well with all the other sports," said Tony Segovia, sr.

The next intramural sport will be five-on-five basketball starting next week.

Chess tournaments will begin Feb. 12. Table tennis, softball, and pool will be announced.

Sign-up sheets are posted in the Sport Center.

Indoor tracksters train for first meet

Seth Good
Spectator Staff

Members of the McPherson College indoor track team compete in their first meet tomorrow in Kearney, Neb. The team has a second meet Feb. 24. The season concludes Feb. 26 with the Indoor Nationals.

Coaches Dane Straight and Rob Lyon are optimistic about the upcoming meets.

"I expect this will be the best indoor track season McPherson will have seen in a long time," Coach Lyon said.

The optimism is based on the runners themselves. The men's team is particularly strong in the short distances. Sprinters Matt Holtry, Russell Williams, Larry Sanders, Matt Lischmann, and Brandt Born compete in several of the dashes and sprint relays. Heath Garner covers the distance and middle distance events for the men's team.

"It's my first time [in indoor track]. It's getting me faster and more explosive. I'm planning on running outdoor, too," Lischman said.

The women's team consists of Michelle Schulz, Melissa McAllister, and Marisol Sanchez. While all three run middle distances, Schulz and McAllister are training for distance. Sanchez is the lone sprinter.

Indoor track is limited by space, which alters and even eliminates many events found in outdoor track.

The track length varies from meet to meet, but is generally half that of an outdoor track, or 200 meters. Relays and distance races stay the same; however, events such as hurdles and some field events are cut out.

Indoor track originally started to keep track athletes in shape for the spring season. This is still a major role of indoor track, but over the years it has developed into a sport all its own.

"Sport is not about being wrapped up in cotton wool. Sport is about adapting to the unexpected and being able to modify plans at the last minute. Sport, like all life, is about taking risks."

Strategic plan creates vision of excellence

Janelle Flory
News Editor

After six months of work, the Strategic Planning Committee forwarded a proposed Strategic Plan, entitled "Toward Being an Authentic Community for Learning," to President Dill yesterday. Dill will present the plan to the Board of Trustees at its meeting on March 2 and 3.

"I really didn't know where [the plan] was going to go. We're dealing with a very competent faculty and staff who are idealistic," Dill said. "The direction they have chosen to go is something I can embrace completely."

During the month of January, SPC faced the task of drafting a plan that would suit everyone, according to Kevin Hadduck, director of academic development and in-house facilitator for the strategic planning process. The committee tried to capture the identity and mission of the college and attempted to determine who we are fundamentally and who we want to become.

The entire plan focuses on several main goals for the college over the next five years: population growth, increased diversity, more advanced technology, strengthened ties to the Church of the Brethren, and higher expectations in all aspects of campus life.

"For all of us, this has been a roller coaster ride," Hadduck said. "There have been high moments and low moments, fears and frustrations and we're all very tired. But we've worked hard. I think we've earned our weariness."

Hadduck, along with Bruce Clary, English, and Lowell Flory, business, provided leadership for the group, according to Dill, each in a specific area; Hadduck in researching and organizing data, Clary in drafting the plan and Flory in guiding the committee through the strategic planning procedure.

"In the process of putting the good thoughts on paper, those three have been very instrumental," Dill said.

The Executive Committee of the Board of Trustees will view the proposed plan at its meeting tomorrow. With Executive Committee approval, President Dill will present the plan to the entire board on March 2 and 3.

Dill described the board's responsibilities in the strategic planning process in a recent memo.

"It is most important that the board deliberately and intentionally frame specific guiding principles that give a context for the college's future plans," he said. "I anticipate that the board will make some critical decisions and give guidance and direction for continuing strategic planning." Over the next five years, the board and SPC will continue to re-evaluate and revise the strategic plan.

A draft of the plan has been sent to Todd Frankenberry, president of the Alumni Association, Merlin Frantz, convener for Faculty Emeriti, Alan Gumm, faculty chair, Jessica Miller, SGA president and Deb Wagoner, president of the Staff Association. Copies of the plan are available upon request.

"I want people to know that they can always give feedback. I would welcome feedback up until the time of the board meeting and after," Dill said. "A good strategic plan is never totally finished."

Frantz demolition begins

The building which once housed the art department is now a pile of rubble. Students and faculty salvaged old pottery and paintings before the destruction began on Monday, Feb. 6.

"Dead Man Walking" author to present lecture on Sunday

Sister Helen Prejean, author of "Dead Man Walking: An Eyewitness Account of the Death Penalty in the U.S.," will deliver the 12th annual McPherson College Religious Heritage Lecture. Prejean speaks at the Church of the Brethren Sunday at 7:30 p.m.

"Dead Man Walking," Prejean's 1993 account of her friendship with death row inmate Eddie Sonnier was nominated for a Pulitzer Prize and later became a major motion picture, starring Sean Penn and Susan Sarandon. In the book, Prejean writes, "Before, I had asked God to right the wrongs and comfort the suffering. Now I know-really know-that God entrusts those tasks to us."

Prejean, born and raised in Louisiana, joined the Sisters of St. Joseph of Medaille in 1957 and earned degrees in English and religious education. In 1981, she worked with inner city residents at the St. Thomas Housing Project in New Orleans and later began counseling death row inmates at Louisiana State Penitentiary. Prejean has accompanied five men to execution and also worked with murder victims' families.

In 1998 and 1999 Prejean was nominated for the Nobel Peace Prize. She is a member of Amnesty International, the U.S. National Coalition to Abolish the Death Penalty, and honorary chairperson of Hands Off Cain, an international group based in Rome working for abolition of the death penalty. She continues to travel around the world, sharing her experiences and working to abolish the death penalty.

Copies of "Dead Man Walking" are currently available in the McPherson College Bookstore and will be offered after the lecture. Prejean will sign books after the lecture. Proceeds from the sale of her book help fund Moratorium 2000, an international group who also seeks abolition of the death penalty.

The Religious Heritage Lectureship was established at McPherson College through the generosity of anonymous contributors. In 1998, Dr. Waldo Newberg of Hillsborough, Calif., assumed the responsibility of nurturing the series by establishing the Nelson Memorial Chair of Christian Education, in memory of John Emil Nelson and Olive Octavia Nelson. The lecture is free of charge and open to the public.

McPherson College in compliance with fundraising guidelines

LeAnn Wine
Editor in Chief

The Chronicle of Higher Education incorrectly listed McPherson College among colleges failing to comply with fund raising standards set by the Council for Advancement and Support of Education in an article in its Dec. 10, 1999, issue. The article was based on information provided by 138 colleges that answered a CASE survey in 1999.

The item that caused McPherson College to be listed as out of compliance was a CASE guideline that excludes the counting of intended bequests in reporting campaign progress. The development office staff self-reported its understanding that one bequest violated the guideline because a portion of the gift went to the Enhancing the Legacy campaign.

When CASE staff read the survey, they questioned the exception and contacted the college development office. Jennifer Williams, assistant director of development, spoke with John Abrahams, director of research and information at CASE to clarify the situation. Abrahams told Williams the gift should have been reported as an outright gift since the estate had been settled and the gift received and no longer "intended."

Williams wrote a letter to CASE explaining the situation more fully and requested that McPherson College "be listed as complying with your standards."

"Initially, our mistake was in reading the survey or understanding the terms of the question," said Bob Knechel, executive director of college advancement. "We thought we had corrected it, but apparently communication broke down."

"I want to apologize if a miscommunication took place," Abrahams said. "[McPherson College] should have been in compliance because the institution didn't know where [the bequest] should go" on the survey's form.

Though Abrahams made this statement about McPherson College, he did not say specifically that the other 17 colleges were in or out of compliance. He did communicate to The Chronicle that the language used in the article was unfair to the 18 institutions. The article should not have stated that the colleges were out of compliance, according to Abrahams. In the survey, the questions asked if the school "generally adhered" to CASE standards.

"We have gone at length to communicate to the Chronicle to clarify 'not in compliance,'" Abrahams said.

The Chronicle printed a brief clarification of terms in the Jan. 7, 2000 issue. The paper stated that the Dec. 10 article "may have implied that 18 institutions had acknowledged violating standards issued by CASE." The clarification went on to explain that though the information provided by CASE indicated violations by the colleges, the institutions actually said "that they 'adhere generally to the CASE Campaign Standards' but with possible exceptions."

In the future, CASE will not list institutions that do not adhere to their standards in their public report, Abrahams said. Instead, those institutions will be notified individually.
